

Brett Fallon Speaker - Canberra Rally

Brett Fallon (Qld Farmer) - Shocking Story About ANZ / Landmark

Brett is a wonderful person, someone we would call the "salt of the earth" all those who met him at the Rally in Canberra, and meet-ups before and after the event, were smitten by his charismatic personality and compelling tales.

Brett travelled from the Whitsundays in Queensland to be with us at the rally and freely shared some of what he had suffered at the hands of the ANZ Bank and the ordeals he has been through.

Like a warrior, his words cut deeper than a sword and his actions as an advocate for other Bank Victims is well known.

ANZ revealed it clawed back the value of $14 million of loan impairments after it purchased the Landmark rural lending business from AWB in 2009. ANZ has been condemned for the way it has handled some Landmark customers in distress.

In one case, chief executive Mike Smith flew to outback Queensland to personally apologise to 81-year-old Charlie Phillott, after ANZ forced the family off Carisbrooke Station, which they had held for 50 years.

There was no such apology to Brett forthcoming and the battle continues for compensation - although, how do you put a dollar figure on restoring Brett to the place where he was before this trouble began?

Watch and listen carefully to the following videos to get a glimpse of Brett's story. The day after the Canberra Rally, Brett and others had a chance to attend Parliament House for further Media sessions, see below for Article and click through to see and hear Brett's talk with them.

Once the 'loneliest man in the world', Brett Fallon is back from the dead after banks battle

Author: Tony Wright - The Sydney Morning Herald

"A lot of people are not here today - they're in cemeteries," said Senator Rod Culleton, mounting his latest demand for a royal commission into the treatment by banks of farmers and rural business people.

A gaunt fellow with his pants tucked into high boots was there, however, all but back from the dead.

His name is Brett Fallon, who once owned a string of cane and beef properties in Queensland and who poured petrol over himself and walked into his open cooking fire in 2013 after a bank came and took it all away.

Mr Fallon, whose body will never heal properly, is one of the more prominent voices among those numerous casualties from the bush who have lost everything and blame it on the banks, and specifically the ANZ.

Their grievances go back to a period from 2009 when the ANZ bought a loans book off Landmark Operations and began foreclosing on farmers who missed repayments.

"I was the loneliest bugger in the world when I came out of hospital [after months in a coma and more months of treatment for burns]. The only people who care about us are the so-called lunatics in the Senate," said Mr Fallon, referring to One Nation senators Culleton, from Western Australia, and Malcolm Roberts, who had arranged the press conference in Parliament House on Tuesday at which he and others told their stories in a campaign for a royal commission.

"Rodney Culleton has been through the same pain as the rest of us."

Senator Culleton's status remains in doubt because he had been convicted of a larceny charge — a crime carrying a sentence of one year or more — at the time of the July 2 election. The conviction, which relates to the theft of a $7.50 tow truck key after he tried to stop a truckie repossessing a car he was leasing, has since been annulled.

Senator Culleton has been at war with ANZ after it foreclosed on his West Australian farm in 2013. Senator Culleton's company, Elite Grains, owes the bank $4.3 million, according to a creditors' report.

Whatever Senator Culleton's grievances, it was Brett Fallon whose passion stole the press conference on Monday.

He lives alone these days in the office building of the old Bowen stock saleyards in north Queensland, which he owned before the complex was repossessed.

"My family trust had to divest money to the ANZ to let me live in this tiny area of the saleyards," he said.

He declares he never borrowed any money from the ANZ bank as his portfolio grew from a small cane farm near Mackay to a cane and cattle property near Airlie Beach and to two stations near Bowen and the saleyards.

"My loan was with Landmark, which understood normal seasonal conditions and always made arrangements to get you through tough periods.

"Then there was this corporate take-over by the ANZ."

He said his overdraft was terminated and he was subjected to punitive interest rates on other loans, though he declined to go further for legal reasons.

Police were sent to his property more and more frequently, he said, to support liquidators and to "seize things", including weapons.

"I had more police visits than Ned Kelly," he said.

Finally, he came to believe "the police might up their harassment level".

"They had taken all my guns, so I couldn't shoot myself, so I poured petrol over myself and walked into a fire.

"The world just disintegrates."

Mr Fallon claims he could not have owed any more than $3 million, and could have continued successfully repaying his loans if given the chance. He wants $20 million in compensation from the ANZ.

ANZ has conceded it made mistakes in how some customers were treated after it purchased Landmark.

The bank's deputy chief executive, Graham Hodges, told a parliamentary inquiry last year the bank only repossessed properties after monetary defaults and after "extensive" work with customers.
